

combining the facts so laboriously gleaned in French and English voyages of the time. To this "local color" he added reminiscences of Homer, Virgil, and Tasso—was he not planning an epic? So the raw pigment of Indian vocabulary gives way to suave invocations to the Muse, or to gems of pseudo-classical periphrasis like this sublimation of the musket: "a flaming tube surmounted by the glaive of Bayonne!"

EX-GOVERNOR Simeon E. Baldwin of Connecticut has written and privately printed a memoir of his grandfather, under the title "Life and Letters of Simeon Baldwin," for the purpose partly of introducing an ancestor to his remote descendants and partly of picturing the life and manners of a former generation. The work is interesting, and has considerable historical value in throwing light on the customs of Connecticut from the time of the Revolution to 1850, the more important period being that before 1800. Simeon Baldwin graduated from Yale in 1781, and was a life-long resident of New Haven, except for two years as a tutor in Albany and two years as a congressman in Washington. For twelve years he was a member of the highest court in his state and for fifty years a practicing lawyer. He was a son-in-law of Roger Sherman, and a father and grandfather of Governors of Connecticut. He never became, as his grandson says, a great scholar, a great lawyer, a great statesman, or a great judge; but he did outdistance mediocrity, though never attaining in any direction the highest rank. This biography of him is chiefly valuable for the documents that it contains—letters, diaries, and journals, here printed sometimes in the form of extracts and sometimes in full.

THE title, "A Century of Science in America" (Yale Press), as given to the handsome octavo volume edited by Professor Edward Salisbury Dana, is somewhat misleading. The book is in no sense a general treatise on science, but is in reality a publication issued to celebrate the centenary of the American Journal of Science. On the first title-page of this famous journal we read that it is to deal more especially with mineralogy and geology, and nine-tenths of the present volume has to do with these sciences. Professor Dana contributes a chapter on the history of the Journal of Science from 1818 to 1918; in the following essays, various authors deal respectively with the century's achievement in Geology, Land Forms and Earth Structure, Palæontology, Petrology, Mineralogy, Chemistry, and Physics. The two final chapters, covering about fifty pages, present a superficial review of the corresponding advance of Zoölogy and Botany, thus barely justifying the major title of the volume. The chapters vary greatly in value as well as in method of treatment; but on the whole they are well done, and give an excellent summary of the progress of the inorganic sciences during the last hundred years in America.

COUNT no man happy until he is dead, sagely advises Solon, according to Herodotus. Mr. James Morgan, in adding some concluding pages to his "Theodore Roosevelt: The Boy and the Man" (Macmillan), a popular biographical sketch that first appeared twelve years ago, finds his hero the very type and model of true Americanism "even in death" and from his "modest grave" at Oyster Bay still bearing "mute testimony" to the virtues exemplified in his life. These closing passages are gathered into two short chapters, "From White House to Jungle" and "The Bull Moose and the Last Years," covering in briefest outline the last dozen years of Roosevelt's life and deepening the impression of the man's exceptionally forceful and attractive personality. The loyal biographer assures us that "Roosevelt did not betray the Republican party to its overwhelming defeat when he abandoned it in 1912," but that "it was betrayed to that disaster when it abandoned his leadership in 1909." And so the final strokes are added to the portrait of as masterful and salient a personality as painter could desire for his brush.

The Pick of the Spring Books

A selected list of the more interesting and important publications of the present spring season, conveniently classified under various subject headings.
